

PREPARED FOR SEAN & TRACY

The Next 90 Days

Your sales deck already says it. This is the plan to make the rest of the world, and every AI answering a founder's question, say it too.

September 2026 · thisisbrave.co

You already wrote the answer. It's in a PDF.

What is already true

- Your sales deck is sharp, direct and completely clear about the offer.
- Thirty days for one complete brand is a real product with a real price.
- Sixty-plus recognisable brands and two genuinely senior principals.

What is holding it back

- None of that language reaches the website.
- The machines reading your site cannot tell what you sell.
- Almost nothing about Brave & Co exists off your own domain.

This is a distribution problem, not a positioning problem. Distribution is fixable on a schedule.

This is not a standing start

Most agencies at this stage are still assembling their proof and inventing their offer. Both already exist here. The plan is about distribution, not creation.

60+

brands on the logo wall
in your sales deck

45 case studies already built and published

30 day complete brand,

already productized

7 testimonials from named executives

Plus awards across 18 programs, from Effie and The One Show to Nielsen Breakthrough Innovation.

Four gaps between the work and the world

1 The site is quieter than the sales deck

The sales deck says sometimes the business outgrows the brand. The homepage says brave is a big word meant for heroes, leaders, poets and punks. One of those makes a buyer lean in.

2 The AI layer hasn't met you yet

Your site publishes a summary file built for AI readers. Right now it describes a UL Solutions campaign. Easy to fix, and nobody else in your category has noticed theirs.

3 The offer is invisible online

Thirty days, one complete brand, four named deliverables, a real price. It lives in a PDF. A model reading your website has no idea you sell anything specific.

4 The record stops at your own domain

Four spellings of your name, a stale email address, and no profile on any directory a model would cite. The work is real. The paper trail is thin.

What the machines currently read

Three things pulled straight off the live site. None of this is neglect. It is what website builders leave behind when nobody goes looking.

Your AI summary file, first line

```
"UL Solutions launched the Prove It campaign to establish trust in a market filled with unverified claims..."
```

A model asking what Brave & Co does is told about someone else's campaign.

All the structured data on your homepage

```
{ "@type": "WebSite", "name": "Brave & Co",
  "url": "https://www.thisisbrave.co" }
```

No organisation, no founders, no services, no offer, no testimonials.

Where the Quest Diagnostics case study lives

```
/blank-1-1-1-1-1-1-1-1-1-1-1-1-1-1-1-1-1-1-1-1-4-1-1-1-2
```

Forty-four more like it, each with no description attached.

Four names is fine. Four unconnected records isn't.

Plenty of large brands run handles that don't match their domain, because availability differs platform to platform. It costs them nothing. The goal is not one string that happens to be free everywhere. It is telling the machines these profiles are one company.

What actually has to match

The display name

"Brave & Co" on every profile, even where the handle can't be

A link home

Each profile links back to thisisbrave.co

A sameAs declaration

Organization schema on the site listing every profile URL

What is actually broken

The email on the site

Hello@braveand.co isn't the address they use. Worth testing whether it bounces.

Tracy's LinkedIn headline

Still reads "Brave World Marketing", naming a different company outright.

Fix the declaration, not the handles.

AI does not read your website to recommend you

When a founder asks a model who should rebuild their brand, it answers from third-party sources: comparison guides, directories, press and profiles. Agency websites barely factor in.

The agencies being recommended today wrote the guides that recommend them. That is an authorship game, not an ad-spend game, and it is wide open.

Named today when founders ask

Red Antler · Focus Lab · Motto

Clay · Koto · Ramotion · COLLINS

Where those names come from

Self-published comparison guides from smaller agencies, plus directory profiles and press mentions.

Brave & Co is not in that record yet. Phase 3 puts you there.

The answer is already written

Same company, same month. The left column is what a visitor reads. The right column is what you hand a prospect.

On the website

"Brave. It's a pretty big word. Meant for heroes, leaders, poets and punks wild enough to make an idea more than an idea."

Beautiful writing. The visitor still has to work out what is being sold.

In the sales deck

"Sometimes the business outgrows the brand. Your business has moved forward. Your brand hasn't."

Names the problem, names the buyer, and earns the next question.

Phase 2 is largely a copy exercise. The strategy work is done.

THE LINE TO LEAD WITH

When the needs of the business outgrow the brand.

Stage-agnostic on purpose. A twelve-person startup with a logo and a template qualifies. So does a company entering a new category. It covers launching, growing, repositioning, raising and exiting without naming any of them, so it never accidentally disqualifies the person reading it.

Make "we meet you where you are" visible

Right now that is a claim on a page. As a ladder it becomes something a visitor can see, a referrer can point at, and a model can quote.

Focused Scoped One piece. Positioning, or naming, or identity. For companies that know exactly what they are missing.	One Complete Brand $30,000 Strategy, Voice, Identity, Brand Book. The whole system, built and handed over in thirty days.	Complete + Launch $45-55k The same thirty days plus naming, deeper research, or the assets to put it into market.	Brave Alongside $8-12k / mo Senior partnership after handover. Where a one-month project becomes a long relationship.
--	---	---	---

Thirty days for thirty thousand stays exactly as it is. What changes is that it stops being the only number on the page.

Four audiences, one number

Clutch puts the average branding engagement at $71,652 over eight months. Focus Lab's fastest comparable tier runs $15-50k across one to three months. Nobody credible delivers complete in thirty days.

Founders and owners

Reframes, doesn't discount

Above the 8 to 25 thousand they have been told to expect, so speed has to lead. Eight months versus thirty days is a different decision, not a cheaper one.

VC and PE

Almost frictionless

Below most approval thresholds and it fits inside a 100-day plan. Quote a portfolio program at 120 to 150 thousand, never the single sprint price.

Referrers

The whole point

Thirty grand, thirty days, complete brand, you work with the founders. Someone can text that. Every alternative starts with it depends.

Search and AI

Highly citable

A symmetric, specific, quotable number is exactly what a model repeats back. It is the most extractable fact you have.

Verdict: hold at $30,000. Raise it once the third-party record exists, not before.

Tracy is right. Keep the big work.

Studio McGee sells at Target because the premium brand above it is real, visible and purchasable. The halo is doing work. For that to happen here, three things have to be true.

1

Attribution, not a disclaimer

The footer currently hedges the portfolio as prior-role contributions. Name what Sean and Tracy did, on which brands, in which roles.

2

A premium tier you can actually buy

McGee's Target line sits under something purchasable. Right now the big work is displayed but not for sale.

3

An explicit bridge

Target explains the relationship for McGee. Nothing on the site connects Coca-Cola to a thirty-day brand sprint. Say it out loud.

The portfolio stays. What changes is that the halo actually transfers.

Proof they can see themselves in

The portfolio proves you can do the work. It doesn't prove you can do this work, for this buyer, at this price. Those are different claims, and only one of them is on the site.

What a founder concludes today

“They're too expensive for me.”

“I'd be their smallest account.”

Capability is proved. Fit isn't.

Three to five case studies, same shape

What had outgrown the brand

What got built in thirty days

What changed afterwards

RYZ, Lift Lending, Fintrustia and Winter Park Chateau are already on the site, but only as testimonial quotes.

Studio McGee doesn't sell the Target line with photographs of custom homes.

Three frameworks is the same as none

The Brave Decision OS

on the site

Signal · Co-Viction

Create · Lead

The five verbs

in the sales deck

Position it · Name it

Say it · Design it · Build it

The four deliverables

inside the offer

Strategy · Voice

Identity · Brand Book

Two of those are the same thing in different words. Position it is Strategy. Say it is Voice. Design it is Identity. Build it is the Brand Book.

Why this matters beyond tidiness

A model builds its answer from what a site repeats consistently. Three names for one method splits that reinforcement three ways, and when the signals conflict it hedges. You get described as “a branding agency” instead of “thirty days, one complete brand.”

Keep the Decision OS, but move it. It's the right pitch for a PE operating partner, and the backbone for the writing in Phase 3.

HOW TO READ THIS

Every action is scored 1 to 5

The score is leverage, not difficulty. A five moves the most and usually costs the least.

- 5 Move now Highest leverage. Unlocks the work behind it.
- 4 High impact Real gain. Schedule inside its phase.
- 3 Steady build Compounds over months, not weeks.
- 2 Housekeeping Quick, easy, worth doing.

Make it readable

Fast, mechanical wins that let machines see what humans already see.

5

Rewrite the AI summary file

One paragraph replaces the UL Solutions text with who Brave is, who you serve, and what you sell. Shortest path to a better answer from every model.

5

Declare who you are in code

Organization schema with a sameAs list naming every profile as the same company, plus founders, services, testimonials and the phone. This is what lets mismatched handles work.

4

Fix the two things that are simply wrong

The email address published on the site isn't the one they use, and Tracy's LinkedIn headline names a different company.

4

Publish the logo wall

Sixty-plus brands on your logo wall, a fraction of them on the site. Fastest credibility gain available, and it takes an afternoon.

4

Give the work real addresses

The case studies live on auto-generated URLs. Renaming them turns 45 pages into 45 front doors.

Port the sales deck

The positioning problem is already solved. It is just trapped in a PDF.

5

Lead with the outgrown brand

When the needs of the business outgrow the brand. Stage-agnostic, covers launching through exiting, and never disqualifies anyone.

5

Put the offer and price on the page

Thirty days. One complete brand. Thirty thousand. Four named deliverables. The most citable, most conversion-ready asset you own.

4

Build the ladder around it

A scoped tier below, a launch tier above, a retainer after. Makes meeting companies where they are something a visitor can see.

4

Make the provenance transfer

Name what Sean and Tracy actually did on Gillette and Coca-Cola. A disclaimer invites doubt. Attribution carries the halo.

3

Let the five verbs lead

Position it. Name it. Say it. Design it. Build it. Keep the Decision OS as the methodology page underneath.

Get named in the answer

Build the off-site record that AI recommendations are actually drawn from.

5

Publish on a cadence

Tracy's first post is exactly right. Two a month on brand, growth and what waiting costs turns one article into a body of work.

5

Own the comparison piece

The agencies being recommended wrote the guides that recommend them. You are better qualified than anyone currently writing those.

4

Claim the third-party record

Crunchbase, Clutch, G2, business listings. Models cite those far more readily than your own site, and it is what lets the price rise later.

3

Turn up founder visibility

Podcasts, bylines, a steady LinkedIn rhythm. Sean and Tracy are the most quotable assets in this plan.

Compound it

Turn the first 90 days into a system that keeps paying.

4

Sell the portfolio program

PE operating partners and VC platform teams buy for whole portfolios. Four or five sprints priced together sounds right to that buyer.

4

Make day 31 a real offer

The retainer is where the margin lives. A thirty thousand project should become a hundred and thirty thousand relationship, not an ending.

3

Watch your answer share

Check monthly what the major models say when a founder asks who should brand their company.

2

Build the capture habit

Every engagement produces a written case study within 30 days of close, so the library never falls behind the work.

If you only did six things

5

PHASE 01

Rewrite the AI summary file

5

PHASE 01

Declare who you are in code

5

PHASE 02

Lead with the outgrown brand

5

PHASE 02

Put the offer and price on the page

5

PHASE 03

Publish on a cadence

5

PHASE 03

Own the comparison piece

Six actions. Two take an afternoon. Together they change what every model and every search engine can say about Brave & Co.

Three questions, then week one begins

1 How much of a month does a sprint really take?

If it consumes both of you, capacity caps around ten a year. That decides whether $30k is the engine or the door.

2 Will you put your names to the big accounts?

Attribution is what makes the portfolio halo transfer. If the disclaimer exists for a reason, we work around it.

3 Does the price go public?

It is the biggest qualification lever you have, and the single most quotable thing about you.

Answer those and Phase 1 can be finished inside two weeks.